F. EnergyStar/DCKV transition from Emerging Technology – Tanja

Presentation “Energy Star Commercial Kitchen Ventilation” was given by Tanja Crk and Adam Spitz. Presentation has been posted on Basecamp on the minutes page. Also had a discuss during the TC meeting. Notes on conversation from Tanja and Adam are below:

- ENERGY STAR has been aware of field test protocols (CEE, ASTM F2976) and capture and containment (ASTM F1704) since the ES Emerging Tech Award for DCKV in 2015-16.
- ENERGY STAR is looking into lab-based energy performance test methods that the industry adheres to for DCKV or more broadly, CKV, to potentially develop a product specification.
 - Has there been an ASHRAE test method under development for commercial ventilation? The committee responded that no there is no industry test method.
 - What are the ASHRAE TC 5.10 committee's thoughts on AMCA 214 and would fans & blowers subsume CKV? A question was posed in the room whether EPA has talked to AMCA and the answer is no, but AMCA has petitioned DOE (in 2020) to use AMCA 214 in the regulatory process for fans & blowers.
- Feedback and considerations shared by the attendees includes the following:
 - Duct layout is an important consideration
 - Lab test drawdown can be tricky. Could verify a spot check in the field. You can't buy ventilation hoods and system of the shelf
 - The cooking process drives energy consumption, which may introduce variability
 - Grease particles are different for each installation, so the pressure drops and other factors are different for each application/site
 - A more holistic picture of CKV may need to be considered for an ENERGY STAR specification
 - ENERGY STAR is looking into possibly similar approaches used in residential specifications, and will follow up with Andre
 - Attendees discussed the idea of the committee to develop a list of guidelines (best practices). How the system operates correctly
 - An ASHRAE SPC could be developed to discuss test method development further
 - Texas A&M offered to run hood testing and would like to be involved
 - ENERGY STAR would be involved in any CKV discussions
